Course Objective
Philosophy begins in wonder. To wonder one must be like a child in which everything becomes a new experience again. As philosophers, our “new experience” will happen through thinking. In turn, thinking this way will allow us to reexamine our prejudices and previously ascribed beliefs. Ironically, what we may come to realize is that philosophical inquiry doesn’t always lend itself to answers as is commonly understood, i.e., philosophy is not a gathering of “facts.” Instead we will see that it is in the very questions themselves, as well as the questioning stance, that the power of philosophy lies. In this class we will examine major themes from the Western philosophical tradition. Some of these themes are: “What is the soul and is it immortal?” “What can I be certain of?” “What is the life well lived?” “Am I free and if so, how can I live authentically?” As we work through these difficult but rewarding questions, we will trace the history of the self from ancient roots to its modern conceptions. In the end we will see how philosophy can lead us from the certainty of the naïve to the wonder of the wise.
