There is a communal and global demand for organ donation within the United States. Currently, 108,980 people require an urgent, life-saving transplant. This demand leads to unsustainable and unethical solutions like organ trafficking. Throughout the Christian scriptures, there are passages that support and encourage organ donation through the practice of bodily sacrifice. Moreover, the theological perspective of stewardship—the call to respect God's gift and enable it to flourish—advocates the giving of one’s body. Based on scriptural teachings and the theological understanding of stewardship, Christians are called to respond to the shortage of life-saving transplants by participating in organ donation.
