Final Exam: Take-home exam
Due to Professor by July 18, 2019
This is a three-credit, simulation course in drafting, negotiating, and construing contracts. The course is practical in nature and encompasses basic contract concepts and the development of the analytical skill of translating a business deal into written contract documents. To that end, it involves the drafting of each part of a contract, beginning with the preamble and ending with the signature line. Matters of clarity and ambiguity are addressed. The lawyer’s role as a business counselor is explored and will be developed through real commercial transactions. Students will be presented with business transactions, problems that arise in drafting, and problems that arise after the contract has been drafted. Additionally, students will navigate through the language of a contract to set forth a recommended legal course of action for their clients. Students will receive feedback on simulated exercises and assignments and will also have opportunities to engage in self-evaluation, such as comparing their work product to that which can be expected when employed in legal practice. The credits in this course may be used to satisfy the experiential learning requirement and, for those subject to that requirement, the skills requirement.

The goals of the course are to stimulate informed discussion, encourage rigorous and critical thinking, help students with speaking and presentation skills, and teach students to use science and medicine in a deep and more accurate way in their practices.

The class will be primarily in a discussion format in a seminar setting. In addition to being prepared to discuss the assignment for the week, students will be periodically assigned a neuroscience cases or topic and will serve as the point person for that week’s issues, acting as a catalyst for the class’s discussion.

The class will include assignments throughout the semester and the grading will be based on the quality of class participation, short papers, and an individual presentation on a subject of the student’s choosing that relates to the course.
